There comes a time in everyone's life when they realize it is time to downsize. Whether this is a decision that you are happy to make or one that you have trouble coming to terms with, for most people downsizing is a fact of life. Maybe you are relocating from a large family home to a small bungalow or condominium apartment. Or maybe you have reached an age where moving to a retirement residence with a single room makes sense.

The fact of the matter is, when you downsize your home, you will be faced with some work to do and important decisions to make. For many, moving the contents of your home is stressful enough. This stress is compounded when you are forced to whittle down into a manageable and moveable collection your most treasured possessions.

Hard decisions must be made about what to do with prize possessions and family heirlooms that you no longer have room for. Downsizing is a time fraught with emotion. As well, physical and financial stresses can add to the emotional trauma for downsizing your home.
